They had their own plan for pooling, their own plan for allocation, their own plans for saving labor, and all they lacked was an efficient system of underwriting. It has been learned that it is the custom of these boys, each charged by his own employer with a series of deliveries throughout the zone below the dead line, to meet at an appointed place, pool their deliveries, allot them by districts, and swap hundreds of thousands of dollars among themselves with the abandon of a devotee of the ivory gallopers. Each boy would take a certain office building of a certain district and make all the deliveries there both for himself and his pals. As a result it has proven almost impossible to trace the securities missing in an accurate fashion until approached from the other end.

The credit for solving the thefts, ac cording to the District Attorney's office, goes largely to Detectives "Auggle" Mayer and "Gus" Brown. The detectives found it at first impossible to trace the lost certificates through the mazes of messenger boy arrangements. Hence they went to the bonding companies who had to pay for the missing valuables and induced them to send broadcast the DEAD WHEN PARDON ARRIVES numbers of the stolen certificates and bonds. As a result the bonding companies and the police soon began to re-ceive information of the location of the loot. It was easy then to trace them back to the last known point of depar-ture from the straight and narrow path.

that the Liberty bond thefts were not the result of any organized scheme, but the sporadic theft of securities universally advertised as saleable at or near their face value. The theft of the other securities, however, bore the earmarks of organized work, and the two detectives came across the trail of Sullivan & Co.

and W. W. Easterday.

As the result of further evidence brought out yesterday of the complicity of David W. Sullivan in the alleged scheme, the head of Sullivan & Co. spent last night in the Tombs. He had had his bail on two indistments charging the
